Session Description

Across the U.S. there are multi-sector partnerships forming between hospitals and health systems, public health agencies, community development groups and other sectors to explore innovative ways to invest in prevention and social determinants of health. At this session, you will learn how these multi-sector partners are leveraging their collective resources to move the needle on social determinants of health, including affordable housing, homelessness initiatives, healthy food, education, workforce training, parks, and transportation access. Speakers will discuss the types of financing strategies they are deploying, ranging from anchor institutions, blending and braiding funding, community development financing institutions, accountable communities for health, and social impact investing.

Key Topics

- Showcasing best practices in partnerships between hospitals, health care, public health, community development and other sectors investing in social determinants of health around the U.S. and across Southern California.
- Highlighting the spectrum of innovative community investment strategies for prevention and social determinants of health.
- Demonstrating the value of investments in social determinants of health by hospital systems.
- Identifying problems, challenges, opportunities and solutions that arise in innovative community investment models.
- Exploring implementation of these strategies in Southern California.

SPEAKERS

Elizabeth Trombley is manager of upstream community health with Kaiser Permanente Southern California. She oversees the region's upstream community health improvement strategy which seeks to maximize Kaiser's positive impact on the health of communities by leveraging all organizational assets, including and beyond coverage and care, to address social, economic, and environmental determinants of health.

Bill Sadler manages projects and internal operations at the Public Health Alliance of Southern California, a coalition of the executive leadership at ten local health departments protecting the health of nearly 60 percent of California residents. Bill assists with building the capacity of Alliance members to advance policy and systems changes on population health, prevention, health equity, social determinants of health, and built environment issues.

David Zuckerman joined The Democracy Collaborative team in 2012, and serves as director for health care engagement. He coordinates the Healthcare Anchor Network — a health-system-led collaboration focused on improving community health and well-being by building inclusive and sustainable local economies.
